Factoids about the movie:

- Film creator K.C. Bailey was writer, producer, and post-production director. Director was Roger Lindley.
- The gun-shop scene required the shop owner to stay up most of the night before the filming to clear every weapon in the store.
- Several locations and vehicles used in the film were volunteered by Bailey, her friends, and family. And the entire project was done with Bailey's personal savings.
- The owner of the bar where the first day of filming was to take place cancelled the Location Agreement 13 hours before production began.
- When filming in an apartment building, a drunk resident made so much trouble the police had to be called.
- After filming was completed, the tired driver of the lighting equipment truck drove it into a tree limb, causing the only expensive mishap of the film.
- The nurses in the hospital room scene are real; they worked at the Dallas Regional Medical Center where it was filmed.
